Are we on the verge of an Oil Crisis?

“Some organizations are sounding the alarm that rather than a peak demand scenario, we may soon face a peak supply scenario. Or at the least, the loss of global excess spare capacity. The last time this happened, oil prices rose above $100 a barrel....”

The slump in investing in oil and gas the last few years is already making an impact on supplies. “We know, from what we have seen in the last couple of years, that prices around the current level and below are not attracting enough investment. We know the level of natural decline that existing production is undergoing, and we know that demand is picking up at 1.2 to 1.5 million barrels a year. So between increase in demand and natural decline, we need millions of barrels every year to be brought to the market, which requires massive investment.” From Saudi Arabia’s energy minister Khalid A. Al-Falih, CNBC January 2017.

Radiant’s CEO John Jurasin was in New York last week attending the IPAA Oil and Gas Investment Symposium as well as the MicroCap Conference. While there, he again met with financial partners with a goal of finalizing contracts.

Radiant principles will also be attending Thompson & Knight’s Private Equity Institute in Houston as well as many other community and business functions.
